

We live in a market economy. If XM does things better than traditional airwaves, then it is time for the traditional broadcasters to improve their programming quality to a level where they don't lose their listeners. It's the fault of traditional radio and mass-market bilge streaming from the likes of Clear Channel that has lost listeners - it's not the fault of XM or current FCC regulations.

As traditional broadcast radio has gone the way of Wal-Mart, they have soiled their own shorts.
